While the temporary injunction is disappointing, St. John Health continues to work with Karmanos as they consider their options.

The sale to Karmanos is a positive use of the Riverview facility and continues to build upon the investments St. John Health has made in the Riverfront area. It also demonstrates a wise use of limited health care resources on the part of Karmanos by providing a better alternative to building a new facility from the ground up.

St. John Health remains committed to providing what the residents of Detroit need most – access to primary care physicians, community health programs and emergency care services, and we will continue to provide these services in the area. Even after the changes at Riverview, St. John Health continues to be the second largest provider of hospital care in Detroit.
